But hunger gives them strength and courage, Their favoured brethren they devour; Yet, when this strange repast is over, They are no fatter than before. The king awoke, again to slumber; New marvels now before him stood; Fine ears of corn, full seven in number Upon one stalk grew, rank and good. Yet see again! there grew beside them, Seven blasted by the eastern wind, So thin and poor, so sadly shrivelled, Gaunt famine seemed to stalk behind. Call the wise men, call the sages, Let them come before the king; Bring their books, and turn their pages, Find the meaning of the thing. Tis all in vain, no man of Egypt Can at all the truth declare; All their words seem idle babble, Empty as the viewless air. In the...
