Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from A Collection of Papers, Vol. 2: Published Previous to 1909 In its practical relations to operations within the abdomen and pelvis the great omentum has not received the attention its importance deserves. Scarcely an incision is made into the abdominal cavity but this structure appears, yet surgical literature gives it only passing mention. McClellan best describes its anatomic peculiarities as being composed of two folds of peritoneum passing downward from the greater curvature of the stomach, varying in length, then duplicating itself back to the transverse colon. In these four folds of peritoneum is contained a quantity of fat, and to these folds is due the immense power to form adhesions which is the chief characteristic of the omentum, thus furnishing in a normal condition an efficient covering to the viscera from without, and in pathologic conditions from within, a competent barrier. Its blood-vessels freely anastomose with those of the peritoneum, giving enormous vitality, and herein it differs widely from the viscera nourished by a mesentery. Greig Smith is authority for the statement that the normal omentum is not demonstrable on physical examination, and eliminating as abnormal the not uncommon cases of large local deposit of fat in its folds, the assertion is true. The omentum of itself is not often subject to disease, and in most instances is affected secondarily. Primary carcinoma is never found, as the omentum has no epithelial elements. Sarcoma is of rare occurrence, and at times cystic in character; the few sanguinolent cysts which have been collected and reported by Reamy, when not due to injury, were mostly of this nature.
